Course Description

This seminar-style course connects theories of development and concepts of globalization to international applied educational development research through a series of speakers from NGO’s, international agencies and development centers. Students will have the opportunity to engage with practitioners in informal and intimate settings, while developing individualized class projects and assignments.

Through a critical examination of approaches to international applied development, the course examines real-world models of development in order to examine questions regarding the nature of knowledge, post-colonial histories, researcher positionalities, and the relationships between concepts, theory, methodology, community, and identity. Course focuses on participatory engagement as cross-sector strategy frameworks for sustainable, equitable, locally driven educational development efforts.

Dr. Sharon Ravitch (ravitch@gse.upenn.edu) is Senior Lecturer in the Graduate School of Education; Principal Investigator on the Semillas Digitales Initiative; Founding Co-Director of Penn's Inter-American Educational Leadership Network; and Research Co-Director, Center for the Study of Boys' & Girls' Lives.